Excerpt from Discourse on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of William Penn, Delivered in the Independence Hall at Philadelphia, on the 24th October, 1844, Before the Historical Society of Pennsylvania William Penn was born to a competent estate, with the advantages of an honourable descent, and the highest political connexions in England. The only son of Admiral Penn, who had added not a little to the naval glory of his country, he was carefully educated at the University of Oxford, and gave promise of an elevated and brilliant manhood. How could it be otherwise, when we recall the traits which all his contemporaries ascribe to him; - a striking countenance, a fine person, a manly and refined demeanour, a playful wit, an open and even joyous disposition? The solicitude of a watchful and ambitious father, the influence of powerful friends, the personal friendship of a monarch, - all these combined to invite him to a career of worldly eminence and fame. To spurn these advantages - to put back the hand which was kindly stretched out to advance him - to forget the authority of a father to whom he was most tenderly attached - to adopt the rigid and self-denying principles of a despised sect; - these revealed, at an early age, the germs of that native force of mind, that originality and independence of thought, which conspicuously marked his character through subsequent life. Such conduct in a youth may be censured as foward, or condemned as unnatural, and the future man may be exposed to the reproach of visionary delusion or heated fanaticism. But harsh as may be our judgment of the act, all must admire the disinterestedness...
