Excerpt from A Cache Technique for Synchronization Variables in Highly Parallel, Shared Memory Systems Caches have traditionally been used to lower the average latency of memory access. When paired with the individual cpus of a multiprocessor, they have the additional benefit of reducing the overall load on the processor-memory interconnection. Since synchronization variables have been identified as centers of memory contention, we have looked at methods of utilizing the cache to minimize this effect. A technique of polling the cache is proposed to deal with this problem. Consistency within the caches is maintained with a bottleneck-free update facility that exploits the topology of the multistage network. Since an indiscriminate broadcast-ou-write policy can lead to severe network congestion at high levels of parallelism, we selectively invoke these updates from the software. We illustrate our methods with a number of useful synchronization algorithms and present simulation results that support the feasibility of our design. In addition to providing support for basic synchronization operations, our methodology is generally applicable to all parallel algorithms that utilize polling.
